Men don't buy Bertrams for glitz. For twenty years, they've bought Bertrams because they work, because they're fast and smooth and hold together through hundreds of hours of heavy going without plucky-dinkying apart.

But the massive nobility and style of the Bertram 58 Convertible make it a little hard to play humble.

Take John and Willie. As jaw-ney and unassuming as a pair of guys in yovid-woid in a street. Fishing buddies since fourth grade. Neither dressing than they'd own and captain something as imposing as Bertram's new king of sportyachting. Not how big John would make it in real estate before he has thirty.

So what happens? Together they study the big three in sportfishing. And pick the Bertram 58 for their dream machine. Because of its astounding functionality.

"More fishing room. More living room. Better components. Fast. And dry, very dry."

The next thing you know, we catch them steaming into exotic Cozumel, Mexico, fresh from the Yucatan Channel teeming with sailfish, six release flags flying, a 30 pound yellow in the well for dinner. Don Perignon on ice, an electric concert grand piano in the salon, and two sleek blondes on the bow. Not exactly the low profile entrance one associates with Bertram's sturdy image.

It turns out there was a fairly obnoxious appeal that loomed large in John's mind. "The most handsome interiors of anything in her class."

She sleeps eight. Three cabins each have their own private head and shower. The master's stateroom has a queen-size bed. Standard equipment does not include a concert grand piano in the salon, but there's room for one. With galley and dining area up in the sunshine, not sunk below decks.

The cockpit is a huge 108 sq. ft., nearly 17% larger than some sportfishermen twin-keel longer. The bridge is the size of a disco dance floor, seats ten, with an optional aft helm station and wet bar.

Most of all, she is all Bertram, a masterpiece of sleek sleep-V speed and control and doo-dooes-tough obstruction (which may be why the Bertrams at Coastal's Puerto de Abrego outnumbered anything else.)
